Redheads' Cosmetic Problem

By HELEN FOLLETT

Blondes and brunettes can break make-up rules and get away with cosmetic murder, but the red head has to mind her steps. Her flaming thatch is a rare beauty asset, and she doesn't want to do anything that will detract from its blinding loveliness. There's a chance that a crazy lipstick will practically put her color scheme out of business.

There are different types of red heads, tresses ranging from deep Auburn to golden red and red-copper. Nearly always the skin is fair, with a transparent quality that gives it charm and delicacy. The powder should be rich and creamy, rather than a flesh tone. If freckles are present, it may be wise to have a blended powder, a light ochre added to the gardenia tint.

Flame or geranium reds are usually too scenic for the lipstick choice. As a rule the naturalism that is becoming, or blends of red and orange. One should endeavor to repeat the shade of the hair, or come as near duplicating it as one can. If rouge is used it must belong to the same color as the lipstick. Few redheads are improved by the addition of facial blushes.

Paint green eye shadows, impart a depth and luster to blue eyes. They must be applied with the stinginess of a miser.

Selecting dress colors is easier. Black brings out the complexion and hair coloring. Navy blue is safe, and certain shades of green. Brown, the favorite of the average girl, with a red halo, is not always flattering, not offering sufficient contrast. Light shades of blue are fatal, make her look washed out. Creamy tones are pleasing, white should be avoided.
